

President Trump's Impeachment Inquiry

By: Michael Kienzle, Grade 11

On September 24th 2019, Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi announced an impeachment inquiry against President Donald J. Trump. In order to know what an impeachment inquiry is, we must understand what impeachment means first. If Congress feels that a President is unfit for office, they can make an impeachment inquiry.

Once it goes through, the House of Representatives can vote to impeach the President for high crimes and misdemeanors. Impeachment does not mean the President is kicked out of office. In order to remove the President from office, Senate holds a trial to decide the President's fate.

Currently, impeachment is not happening. Only an impeachment inquiry has been made. If enough evidence is found to move forward with the inquiry, they will continue. Currently, about 27 house Democrats have publicly announced support for impeachment. At 6:51 PM October 14th, the house has moved forward with the inquiry. According to Pelosi, six key committees are already investigating the President. As of right now, the house are still investigating if the President is guilty as they say. If he is found guilty, the inquiry will proceed. Once congress moves forward, two-thirds of the Senate will vote on supporting impeachment.

Whether or not the President is guilty is up to Congress to decide. It could take days, weeks, even months. The process can be long and grueling, and may not even end the way we want it to. Long investigations and court cases will be taking place throughout the next few months. All we can do now is sit tight and wait for more information to appear.
